Soon before sundown - everything shines golden. Dwarves become giants and even pebbles cast long shadows. However, the beauty of fading belies the imminent danger. Slobbering and drooling, creatures lurk in the twilight to conquer the throne. And we are somewhere in time and space at the border between shimmering golden light and impalpable darkness.

microClocks capture this fabulous, scary allegory of the world we live in in their latest work "Soon Before Sundown". A world in which delusions are converted into reality and trifles into status quo. A world in which small minds become ringleaders who are just waiting to seize power.

What has been a constant theme in the history of mankind for millennia is now more topical than ever from the band's point of view. Every high culture is doomed to go down. Whether due to arrogance or negligence caused from the inside or the outside.

On the new album, microClocks from the Ruhr area (Germany) again interweave various genres from Classic Rock to Pop, from Electro to Industrial. The result is an audio-visual overall work of art - sometimes apocalyptic and dark, sometimes pensive and personal, but always dynamic and powerful and never only focused on simply wanting to please.

During the album production, big names like i. a. José Alvarez-Brill (Unheilig, Wolfsheim) and Olaf Wollschläger (Mesh, And One) supported microClocks. "Soon Before Sundown" was finished at the HP Mastering Studios in Hamburg by Hans-Philipp Graf who already worked with well-known scene musicians like Lord Of The Lost, Joachim Witt and Stahlmann.
